Konkrétní připomínky a dotazy k práci:

The master's thesis deals with an interesting and often discussed topic of the role of small states in international relations. The author has chosen the Czech Republic and Israel as case studies and aimed for the comparative analysis of those two examples. Generally speaking, it has a very good theoretical and methodological framework, although its theoretical background is very narrow and related to very few resources despite of many existing. Moreover, it has logical structure and provides also a very good language level. It is true to say that the two case studies selected are very different and, as a result, it might not have been easy for the author to make relevant comparative analysis. Nevertheless, the author has been quite successful in fulfilling her goal. Furthermore, she has proven very good work with formal requirements and relevant sources, although its bigger variety would be appreciated. The text undoubtedly fulfils a level of requirements for master's thesis and I do recommend it for the defence.

Questions for defence: 1) How do you think the position of Israel as a small state in international relations will develop in future? 2) To what extent is the rationality of foreign policy of Israel influenced by its tight relations with the U.S.?
