Konkrétní připomínky a dotazy k práci:
In the context of global emigration challenges, the topic of cultural standards and integration into Czech culture is difficult to overestimate. Russians represent important minority in Czech study and work environment and their perception of differences between two cultures deserves appropriate attention.
The work offers a valuable contribution to the topic. It is structured logically and clearly, with a good balance between secondary and primary research. The secondary data analysis forms a comprehensive basis instrumental for interpretation of the interview results. I highly appreciate ensuing primary research as well. Testimonies of respondents provide a profound overview of cultural differences according to the wide range of standards. Nevertheless, the most remarkable part of the thesis is the comparison of the primary data analysis with the theory and notable list of practical recommendations for Russians to bridge over cultural differences and smooth integration into Czech society.
To note some shortcomings, there is a discrepancy between the definitions of the respondents set up in the introduction and the factual profile of respondents in terms of time spent in the Czech environment. Personally, I do not think a person, who have not spent at least one year in a foreign environment, can have enough experience for comparison.
Altogether, I have enjoyed this work and consider it as a highly useful for both academic and practical purposes.
Questions:
1) Considering the limited size of the samples, what measures have been taken by the author to ensure the representativity of the sampling?
2) Based on the outcomes of your primary research could you identify, whether study or work environment is more suitable for smooth integration of Russians into Czech society?
